To my wife, daughter, and son.
You are the creatures under my bed.

The Wandering Eyes

The Wandering Eyes fly through the air.
Going from place to place.

Looking, seeking, searching,
for a home to call a face.

They never stop for long,
for every face they've spied,

Is already filled,
unfortunately occupied.

So on they float, two eyes on the breeze.
Going from town to town.

Talking to each other with blinks and winks,
never making a sound.

Climb up a hill and close your eyes on some windy night.

And the Wandering Eyes might land on you,
and give you quite a fright.

The Something

Something moving.
There, in the dark.

The Something.
Out here,
with us.
In the dark.

What Something?

THE SOMETHING

Now, stay still.
The Something
is moving.

Perhaps, its already had its fill.

The Something
is moving on.
I think, I think,
we are safe.

OH NO, WATCH OUT!
RUN!
NO! IT'S TOO LATE!

A Toilet Monster

I've heard tale of a toilet monster,
Shaped something like a snake.

It likes to slither in the water.
It coils up and it waits.

It waits till you are right over,
Covering the hole.

Its plan is to grab you,
and drag you down below.

But don't worry, you are safe.
Its plan never gets a start.

For its made of toilet paper,
and soon it falls apart!

Stick Creatures

Dry and brittle.
Through mud they scuttle.

Always watchful.
For kids to tackle.

These stick creatures. Are blood thirsty.

Propped together.
Easily scattered.

Kick them swiftly.
They are no trouble.

Just a pester.
Such clumsy monsters.

Ghosts in my House

There is a ghost in my closet.
Behind a box of toys.
When playing, I close the door.
As he doesn't like the noise.

There is a ghost in my chimney.
She wails on windy nights.
So I keep the fire burning.
To show her everything's alright.

There is a ghost in my basement.
Who hides in corners and nooks.
She gets bored down there sometimes.
So I leave her lots of books.

There is a ghost in the hallway.
Who never comes out in day.
At night, she taps my doorway.
To ask if I can come out and play.

Tricky Witches

Tricky Witches dressed as cats.

Lay in the sun on my door mat.

They stretch and purr, hiss and scratch.

All the while, evil plans they hatch.

They want to steal me. Put me in a stew

To make a special witches brew.

They are making magic to take away their old.

Make them young, or so I'm told.

My parents don't have a clue of the terrible things they're up to.

My mother likes their soft fur.

She pets them to here them purr.

My father likes when they catch mice.

He thinks they're helpful, thinks they're nice.

They don't fool me, I have a bag.

I'll capture up those two old hags.

Take them to the river and then,

Well, you can guess how they will end.

Benjamin Bies

Benjamin Bies, covered in flies
He'll give you a lick
Try to make you sick
He's someone to truly despise.

Benjamin Bies, oh how he lies
He'll give you first pick
Of whats in his pocket
The bite's a terrible surprise.

Benjamin Bies, he never dies
He'll give you a prick
With his scorpion stick
With a laugh he's gone at sunrise.

Benjamin Bies, sits in disguise
He'll look sweet and slick
But don't fall for that trick
He would love to be your demise.

The Monster Who Eats Socks

In the back of your closet
Where you may not look
Behind your play clothes
That fell from the hook
In the darkest of corners
In a forgotten shoe box
Lives a tiny little creature—
The monster who eats socks

It may eat just one
Or it may eat a pair
Sometimes just a toe
Is all it will dare
To ingest and digest
For supper or lunch
Or maybe a special
Saturday brunch

So clever and sly
So timid and shy
As quick as a fox

The monster who eats socks.

The Mud Monster

The darkening skies warn of impending danger With lightening and thunder announcing the stranger
Darting about behind clouds holding back rain
Waiting for just the right moment to appear once again

Then, as the raindrops fall to the ground
As if by magic the monster seems all around
First a puddle or two where the ground is so bare
Then like a lake or an ocean almost everywhere
Ready to glob onto goulashes and boots
To catch a ride as into homes we scoot
Appearing from nowhere upon the kitchen floor
Upon the throw rug leading by the front door
Up the stairs it follows me now
Into my room

...Mud Monster how?
How do you come so oozy and wet
Find a good place to become hardened and set
Show the whole world just where I've gone
Through puddles and fields on my way home
Oh, Mud Monster you're such a pain
I'm glad you only come when it rains.

The Dragon of Mount Rainier

The last great dragon of the world
Lives on Mount Rainier

And though it's slept
a long long time
It will soon wake, I fear

The dragon is long tall, and wide with tough scales, bright green

And every story
I've heard of him say he is cruel and quite mean

The dragon, its said killed a thousand men and dragged them to his cave

Ate a hundred right then and there

piled the rest of to save
